

Going to College for History, Linguistics, Ancient Languages, Egyptology or Politics? Without Research from Legesse Allyn You Won't Be Learning the Latest Facts

Legesse Allyn*

Ancient Language Researcher, Los Angeles, California, USA

*Corresponding author: Legesse Allyn, Ancient Language Researcher, Los Angeles, California, USA, Tel: +13108959109; E-mail: legesseallyn@ancientgebs.org

Received date: Sept 12, 2018; Accepted date: Sept 18, 2018; Published date: Sept 25, 2018

Copyright: © 2018 Allyn L. This is an open-access article distributed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution License, which permits unrestricted use, distribution, and reproduction in any medium, provided the original author and source are credited.

Abstract

As a college or university student, you hand over $50,000 or more a year to get degrees in subjects like linguistics, ancient languages, Egyptology, ancient history and others. For that amount of money, one would think they are learning the latest facts and information in those college and university subjects. But this is not always the case. Often it is never the case.

Keywords: Arts; Social; Politics; Language; Learning; Linguistics

Introduction

New ground-breaking research by Legesse Allyn, who has retranslated many important ancient documents including the Rosetta Stone and the Bible, stands to suddenly make obsolete the very "facts" that, up to last century, we accepted to be true. In the 21 books he has published so far, Legesse shows that what we have been led to believe about ourselves based on our "supposed" ancient history, is not always true. In some cases, what we are led to believe is intentionally done to mislead us.

After he retranslated the complete hieroglyphic portion of the famous Rosetta Stone in 2014, not only did Legesse show that the ancient Greeks, surprisingly, translated the Greek message into the ancient Egyptian hieroglyphic language 99.9% accurately, he is now able to utilize that very same process and the Rosetta Stone retranslation itself as yardstick in which to measure all other ancient texts-including the Bible.

Colleges and Universities Do Not Provide the Latest Facts

As a college or university student, the sad reality is that you might not be getting the latest facts and information at all. Even if you earn your PhD, the fact is, college and university textbooks do not usually contain facts. That's right. No facts. And if you are majoring in history, linguistics, ancient languages, Egyptology or politics today, your textbooks are not yet likely to be updated with data from Legesse Allyn's research. This means you are paying this century's tuition money for last century's education.

If the data you'll be fed isn't being updated yet, the question is, what are you paying for at $50,000 per year or more, of which you'll be saddled in debt for nearly the rest of your life. I would say what you're paying for is simply discipline. Discipline? But isn't that what you're already getting for free at home from your controlling parents?

Normally, if you go into a store and buy an item that fails to work or fails to satisfy your needs, you can get a refund because the store and the product provider holds themselves responsible for your satisfaction. Not so with colleges and universities. They don't have to provide the latest facts to you or any facts at all. If you don't receive an education in the latest facts and info in your subject, whether you graduate or not, you're on your own. It's your problem because your tuition is not based on the latest facts, your satisfaction or graduation. So what are you paying for?

You're Buying $50,000 Per Year Season Passes to Classroom Seats

The way to determine what you're paying $50,000 or more per year for is what you are guaranteed. The only thing you're guaranteed for all that money is a seat in class. That's all. No guarantee of the latest facts, satisfaction nor graduation. How is this possible?

In many ways, when you pay tuition it's like you're buying a football season ticket. The difference is, with the season ticket, you are not required to attend any games. But with the college or university tuition you are merely buying what we can consider a classroom seat season pass. But if you miss too many classroom sessions in a season, not only do they take your seat season pass away, but they keep all your money, too. No refunds. And you still owe the money you borrowed for the tuition. What?

Yes, you lose your seat and the money you paid, too, and you still have to pay back the student loan. At least if they taught you some facts, you could go out and earn a living as a consultant with the facts you learned. But you are getting old, stale obsolete education. And nobody's going to pay you today's money for last century's information.

You're Only Guaranteed a Higher Level of Discipline Than You Received At Home

But schools do not promise the latest facts in your subject nor your graduation. Read the fine print. So by forcing you to attend classes, what are you really paying for? Discipline. That's right. They are selling you what your parents provide you for free. Discipline. At $50,000 more per year you are simply paying for an even higher level of intrusion in your life than your parents offer you for free. Control of your next 2 to 8 years or more.

Isn't that one of the main reasons you want to get an education and leave home in the first place? To be on your own, on your own terms, with the freedom to be you? Sorry. There's no freedom to be you in a college or university. That in addition to no up-to-date facts.

Like an animal in a circus, at a college and university you or your parents are literally paying for you to be bossed around, subjected to classroom chores and to have you trained like a circus monkey in a way they wish they could have. Because if they could have on their own, they wouldn't need mortgage the house to get you into college. Just like living with your parents, all you're getting for your money is to be on time and in attendance every day. A monkey in a circus you might have it better. And the higher your "earned" degree, the higher the level of discipline the college or university has trained you for your future employer.

No Room for Independent Thinking, Only Trained Monkeys

Employers want to employ well-behaved monkeys. That will be you with last century's education. Then to add insult to injury, once you've spent all that money on tuition and are saddled the rest of your life with the debt, your new employer will tell you first day on the job, "That's what you learned in school. Now we're going to teach you the real stuff."

The bottom line to all this is colleges and universities cannot sell you facts. If you paid for the latest facts and information, you could simply take what you learn, bypass the employers and compete on their level against them. And no employer wants that. Employers only want you to be well-behaved little monkeys and, like your parents treated you at home, do whatever they say. At $50,000 per year, that's a lot to pay for new parents.

After 2 to 8 years of training and discipline, you are guaranteed to be free of your desire for freedom. The rebellion your parents tried all your life to rid you of. That's all you're paying and going in debt for. That's all.

You Need This Century's Updated Info about History, Linguistics, Ancient Languages, Egyptology and Politics

It is estimated that nearly 35% of American adults receive their income by the new, "gig economy," which the internet has made possible. In an article by The Guardian News (yes the same publication that helped free us from unconstitutional government surveillance exposed by whistleblower Edward Snowden), Rhiannon Lucy Cosslett reports that, "Wanting to escape the office grind doesn't make you a snowflake."

In her article, she states, "The gig economy may be perilous, but there are good reasons millions of young people prefer being freelance." Not only that, but more importantly, Rhiannon writes, "There are 53 million people doing freelance work in the US – 34% of the national workforce. In the UK there are 1.4 million freelancers, an increase of 14% in the past decade. The self-employed are the fastest-growing group in the EU labor market."

Additionally, as for working in an office, "... most people I know who do work in offices do not like their jobs," she writes. As a result, she says a 2014 study found that 87% of students with first-class or second-class degrees found freelancing to be an attractive option." Questioning whether office culture is limited and tyrannical, "It's time we asked ourselves why."

Being a Successful "Gig" Freelancer Requires Knowledge of the Latest Up-To-Date Facts

The fact is being a freelancer in the gig economy can provide you long-sought freedom you've always desired and to succeed on your own terms. But to be a freelancer, you need to be educated with latest up-to-date facts not discipline.

Legesse Allyn, who is literally changing what we understand about history, linguistics, ancient languages, Egyptology and politics, himself relies solely on freelancers. "I have hired nearly three dozen freelancers around the world on over the past three years on Fiverr.com, Freelancer.com and Upwork.com to help me do everything from research, writing, editing, and promoting my 21 books," Legesse says. "Because of these great, young, energetic freelancers, my books are in major university libraries around the world, including University of Oxford, University of Southern California (USC), Cornell, University, Princeton University, Addis Ababa University (AAU) in Ethiopia, as well as Universidad de Deusto in Spain."

So the gig economy is not imaginary. It is real life in this new century information-age. And Millennials are in the forefront of it. With the latest facts and information, Millennials are doing what their parents never dreamed – freedom, opportunity and the ability to work and earn from home.

"Without these freelancers, I just don't know what I would do. They have been essential to my accomplishing the writing and publishing ground-breaking research not even PhDs have accomplished," he says. "Together, we are retranslating ancient texts and seeing into the truth of the past in a way not done in 2000 years, and with their help I've published 21 books that make the so-called "facts" and "settled science" from last century, suddenly obsolete with an incredible chance to change the world we live in."

Millennials are Helping Legesse Allyn Uncover Facts from Conspiracy-Driven Religious Fiction

One of the most astonishing and surprising discoveries Legesse has achieved with the assistance of these young, free-thinking "gig" freelancers, is a 2000 year-old conspiracy to confine people and brainwash them to keep them from their dreams. The conspiracy is one saw ancient Egyptian farming/granary grain sales reports intentionally mistranslated into freedom-stealing religion-the religion of the Bible.

After receiving written permission from Jeff Benner, of the Ancient Hebrew Resource Center (www.ancient-hebrew.org), to utilize the ancient Hebrew text of the Center's "Ancient Hebrew Torah" as the foundation of new retranslations, Legesse was able to retranslate word-for-word Genesis chapters 1 through 4. He published the results in the 2-volume "Amarigna & Tigrigna Qal Genesis" book series.

This myth-shattering research by Legesse and the freelancers he hires is perfect for freedom-seeking young people. The retranslations of the underlying text of what has been mistranslated into the "Bible" confirm the suspicions much of the world has had about its often impossible-to-believe stories. In fact, a PEW Research article online by David Masci entitled, "Why Millennials are less religious than older Americans," discusses the well-placed skepticism regarding the Bible by young adults of college and university age. "While the U.S. public in general is becoming less religious, the nation's youngest adults are by many measures much less religious than everyone else," writes Masci.

Masci sat down in an interview with Michael Hout, a professor of sociology at New York University, to examine possible reasons Millennials are generally not as religious as older Americans. "Hout, who has spent years studying generational and religious changes in the United States," writes Masci, "is the author or co-author of a number of books, including 'Century of Difference: How America Changed in the Last One Hundred Years.'"

Millennials Never Trusted Religion in the First Place and Rightly So

"Many Millennials have parents who are Baby Boomers and Boomers expressed to their children that it's important to think for themselves – that they find their own moral compass. Also, they rejected the idea that a good kid is an obedient kid. That's at odds with organizations, like churches, that have a long tradition of official teaching and obedience," Hout explains.

"As a result, [Millennials] are more likely to have a 'do-it-yourself' attitude toward religion," Hout says, "...it is widespread." Hout continues, "You see evidence of their lack of trust in the labor market, with government, in marriage and in other aspects of life... when it comes to institutions like the press, government and churches." Worst of all, he explains, "And these institutions have let people, particularly young people, down."

Artificial Religious Limitation on Freedom Had Already Been Turning Millennials Away

The proof by Legesse's retranslations that the Bible is artificial and a conspiracy on freedoms will be a sigh of relief to a large percentage of freedom-seeking Millennials. "A clear and justifiable gap has emerged between moderate young people and churches that are taking political positions on abortion, gay marriage and other social issues," says Hout. "When that happens, people who are politically liberal and not active in a particular church often put distance between themselves and organized religion by answering 'none of the above' to questions about religious preference.

Yet, rejection of the Bible religions has not deterred Millennials' interest in God. "I think people assume that people who do not belong to an organized religious group reject religion altogether," Says Hout. He makes the point that Millennials want to simply want to carry out their lives in their own way, pointing out that many who reject the Bible still choose to believe in God and heaven, stating, "...spiritual experiences are still attractive for people who don't go to church. Some people find God in the woods rather than in a church." That's freedom the Millennial way.

"I thought the freelancers I sought to hire to assist me would reject the farm reports-as-religion conspiracy theory straight away," says Legesse. "But the more I spoke to and hired these free-thinkers, the more I saw them breathing a sigh of relief that what has been mistranslated into the Bible was all lies. I mean, who in the 21st century can really believe an old man with three sons of different ethnicities and no wives really built and sailed a ship with two of every animal in the world for 40 days and nights," says Legesse. "The lions told the giraffes, 'We're not going to eat you for 40 days,' and the cobras told the mice, 'We won't eat you. We're good' and bumped fists," says Legesse.

"That would be ridiculous. And nobody died from not eating for those 40 days, walking off the boat as strong and healthy as they were before entering the boat," he says. "But this is an example of last century's misguided and obsolete so-called 'facts' forced upon you. Again, the truth is that you're being disciplined in school, disciplined to believe anything they feed you – even things that are impossible to be true."

Education in this New 21st Century should be Filled with Facts and Less Lies and Corrupt Conspiracies

Education in the modern age must be about providing students the power to opening up their minds, broadening their horizons and relentlessly pursuing the best and latest knowledge that is available to mankind. Bricks-and-mortar institutions not offering this should be boycotted. Students by college age already received more discipline that they ever wanted at home. They don't want to be tricked into more discipline disguised as education and locked into debt for it the rest of their lives.

Young people want freedom. The selling to students of outdated textbooks filled with last century's misinformation must end. Nobody wants to pay for it. History, linguistics, ancient languages and politics are very important to today's society. And it is difficult enough to find the truth in anything today.

Fortunately, there are a growing number of authors, educators, writers and thinkers, like Legesse Allyn, who endeavor to shift the landscape to knowledge. And Millennials have the power to see that the education landscape changes. A knowledge-first model, centered on student having the most accurate, high-quality and accessible knowledge and facts at their fingertips is key.

Control Your Own Future with Up-To-Date Facts and Information from this New Century

If we are truly living in an information age, and not merely a "so-called" information age, then education in this new 21st Century needs to reflect those values, like that of Legesse Allyn, to gain the critical edge they need to power their professional lives and direct their own success.